Button Bay State Park

Welcome to 253-acre Button Bay State Park, established in 1964. Situated on a bluff along the eastern shore of Lake Champlain, the park provides a scenic overview of Vermont's Champlain Valley and the Adirondack Mountains of New York. A broad, sweeping, sickle-shaped, shallow bay, Button Bay is named for the button-like concretions formed by clay deposits found along its shoreline.

The park contains two islands; one, located just offshore from the Button Point Natural Area, is artificial. It once was the location of a large summer home, complete with stone-walled piers that remain today.

The 8-acre Button Point Natural Area is a favorite destination of visitors and contains fossils, a mature forest and several rare and endangered plants. Although this area has been disturbed by human development, it is significant botanically, ecologically, and geologically. A nature center located at the Natural Area has regularly scheduled programs presented by the park interpreter.

The area in and around the park has a rich history. The area was visited by such notables as Samuel De Champlain (1609), Ethan Allen (1776), Ben Franklin (1776), and Benedict Arnold (1777).

The nearby city of Vergennes is named for Charles Gravier, Comte de Vergennes, a Frenchman who aided the colonial effort in the Revolutionary War. In Vergennes, Thomas Macdonough built an armed fleet that later defeated the British on Lake Champlain during the War of 1812.
